IT is customary for most authors to introduce themselves and work to their readers through the medium of a more or less prolix Preface, Foreword, Introduction, Apology, or Explanation. The infinite number and variety of disingenuous excuses that have been employed by them to palliate the just indignation of a longsuffering public, leave but one to the author which has not already been used to the vanishing point of patience, and upon which he seizes with avidity. Happily the sentiment of mankind covers the errors of extreme youth with the stainless mantle of charity. The sins and follies of the young become crimes and misdemeanors in the old, and for this reason only dare the author of Desdemona, handicapped with lack of years and experience, diffidently approach his readers, assured that through his youth alone he must expect absolution. If any other excuse were...
