Four husbands she had had, tis true--the first an undertaker; The second was a butcher stout--the third a tough Scotch baker; The fourth a jolly Beefeater, so very tall and stout, But she contrived to see all in their graves--while she stood out. She did not grieve so very much, as Providence so will d em, But when they died, the neighbours plainly said, Twas she that kill d em; Whether so or not, tis plain, to outlive them she made shift, And having buried all the four, she long d to have a fift . She went to church to get one there bedeck d with silks and satins, A little humpy cock-eyed maid behind her with her pattens; She strutted like a turkey-cock so grand, to catch the men, While the little maid behind her was more like a bantam hen. The parson was a bachelor--but felt in love misgiving, Like many other parsons, he could not live by his living; Her husbands he had known, and he was young enough for her son, He felt inclined to wed her purse--but was afraid of her person. The clerk, a small man, four feet two (his shoulders angled square), Look d from his book to eye her flesh, tho he had none to spare; Said he, She has a heavy purse, which...
